

The Third Annual Synod of the Missionary Diocese of the Central States of the Reformed Episcopal Church
September 23-24, 2010

The Rt. Rev. Wesley Nolden, Assistant Bishop, Presiding
The Venerable Peter Manto, Archdeacon
The Rev. Canon Scott Houser, Canon
The Rev. Franklin Sanders, Treasurer
The Rev. Daniel Thomas, Secretary

The Archdeacon called council to order. Rev. Longmire explained Art. 7 sec. 2 which says that in the bishop's absence, since Bp. Nolden is not the suffragan, a president must be elected. Chairman of the Trustees, the Archdeacon, called for a motion to install the Rt. Rev. Wesley Nolden as the President over this Synod as the Rt. Rev. Daniel Morse is absent due to his wife's illness. Nominated Bp. Nolden, seconded by Camlin. Called by order, clergy, laity. Passed.

Bp. Nolden opened in prayer. Prayed for Bp. Daniel Morse and Marianne Morse.

He introduced himself. He is the Assistant Bishop of the Diocese.

He asked, what are the only things in heaven made by human hands? They are the holes in the hands and side of Jesus Christ. This keeps us humble and focused on Jesus. Our job is not to build a better bureaucracy but to bring people to Jesus Christ.

Bp. Nolden read Bp. Morse' report in his absence into the minutes:

Report of the Rt. Rev. Daniel R. Morse
Bishop, The Missionary Diocese of the Central States

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In accordance with the Canons of this Church, I hereby present you with a list of all active clergy in the Diocese of Mid-America. Attached to the end of the Annual report is the current list. All Deacons and Presbyters on that list are current.

On this occasion of my Third report as Bishop of this Diocese, I submit this summary of my activities during this past year in the work of the episcopate.

I made 22 Episcopal visits to the Parishes and Missions of this Jurisdiction, and 9 persons were presented to me for the laying on of hands in the ancient rite of confirmation. In addition to those Episcopal visits, I had preaching engagements and meetings with clergy as enumerated below:

EPISCOPAL VISITS

Following is my report of the Episcopal visits I made since our last meeting, as well other activities.

Location	Date	Special Purpose	Confirmations
Summerville, SC	Oct. 6-10	Bishops' meeting
Houston, TX	Oct. 15	Bp. Grote's 25 th anniversary
Appomattox, VA	Oct. 25
Sevierville, TN	Nov. 1
Shalimar, FL	Nov. 15
Men's OH conference	Nov. 20-21
Mason, OH	Nov. 22
Toronto	Dec. 9-12	ACNA Provincial Council
Appomattox, VA	Jan. 10	Receive St. Andrew's
Dayton, OH	Jan. 18-20
Dayton, OH	Feb. 7
Wilson, NC	Feb. 8	Visit Paul Edgerton
Sevierville, TN	Feb. 21	Church dedication
Aiken, SC	March 5-7	Discuss membership in REC
Summerville	April 14-17	Bishops' meeting
Shalimar, FL	April 26
Raleigh, NC	May 2		1
Raleigh, NC	May 5	Chapel at Trinity Academy
Fairfax, VA	May 30		2
Norge, VA	June 6		1
Boston, MA	June 7-11	ACNA Provincial Council
Evansville, IN	June 19		3
Mobile, AL	July 11
	Aug. 5	Trustees
Aiken, SC	Aug. 6-8	Receive Church of the Good Shepherd
Memphis, TN	Aug. 15	Dedicate new altar
Dayton, OH	Aug. 27-29	Receive Christ Our Hope	2
Summerville, SC	Sept. 28-Oct. 2	Bishops' meeting

It has certainly been a great blessing to me to visit all of you and your parishes, and I hope that I have been able to encourage you in your ministries.

I am very sad not to be with you for this meeting of the Synod due to my wife's recent surgery for bladder cancer and beginning of chemotherapy. We certainly do appreciate your prayers and all the expressions of love and support. I am especially thankful for my dear brother, Bishop Wes Nolden, who has graciously agreed to moderate the business portions of the meeting and to ordain Deacon John Johnson to the Presbyterate. In connection with that I want to give my special welcome to Fr. Ray Kasch, Rector of St. Patrick's Anglican Church in Smyrna, TN, a CANA parish, to participate in John's ordination.

It was my intention to bring with me to this meeting a case of anointing oil—a very nice olive with a slight frankincense and myrrh fragrance—so that I might bless it and give them to you. I do have the case at home. I can bring a bottle to you when I make my next Episcopal visit to your parish, or I would be happy to mail you a bottle. It is a 2 oz. bottle that should last you the whole year unless you bathe in it.

I need to remind you to download the packet of Episcopal visit report forms from the REC web site so that when Bp. Wes and I make our Episcopal visits we will have the information we need to be more effective pastors to this diocese.

FOR YOUR PRAYERS

I commend to your prayers Fr. Paul and Christie Edgerton of our mission in Wilson, NC. As you know Paul suffers from chronic Lyme disease, and Christie is presently in danger of losing their unborn baby. Also, I commend to your prayers our new missions in Dayton, OH, Christ Our Hope; Church of the Good Shepherd in Aiken, SC; St. Andrew's Appomattox Anglican Church, Appomattox, VA; St. Peter's in Norge, VA. If there are representatives of those parishes present I think you would enjoy a brief report from them on the progress of the works.

CLERGY TRANSFER

I transferred the Rev. Douglas Mills to the Diocese of Mid-America.

FOR YOUR CONSIDERATION

I commend for your edification the introduction to Desiring the Kingdom by James K. A. Smith. The whole book is well worth reading. You will probably think this has to do with Christian schools, but listen and read carefully, and you will find that it goes much deeper and further.

Introduction

BEYOND "PERSPECTIVES"

FAITH AND LEARNING TAKE PRACTICE

What is education for? And more specifically, what is at stake in a distinctively Christian education? What does the qualifier Christian mean when appended to education? It is usually understood that education is about ideas and information (though it is also too often routinely reduced to credentialing for a career and viewed as a ticket to a job). And so distinctively Christian education is understood to be about Christian ideas—which usually requires a defense of the importance of “the life of the mind.”¹ On this account, the goal of a Christian education is the development of a Christian perspective, or more commonly now, a Christian worldview, which is taken to be a system of Christian beliefs, ideas, and doctrines.

But what if this line of thinking gets off on the wrong foot? What if education, including higher education, is not primarily² about the absorption of ideas and information, but about the formation of hearts and desires? What if we began by appreciating how education not only gets into our head but also (and more fundamentally) grabs us by the gut—what the New Testament refers to as kardia, “the heart”? What if education was primarily concerned with shaping our hopes and passions—our visions of “the good life”—and not merely about the dissemination of data and information as inputs to our thinking? What if the primary work of education was the transforming of our imagination rather than the saturation of our intellect? And what if this had as much to do with our bodies as with our minds?

What if education wasn't first and foremost about what we know, but about what we love?

That actually is the wager of this book: It is an invitation to re-vision Christian education as a formative rather than just an informative project.³ It is an invitation to what we'll call an "adventure in philosophical anthropology"; its root conviction is that how we think about education is inextricably linked to how we think about human persons. Too much of our thinking about education (including much recent talk about worldviews) sees education as a matter of disseminating information precisely because it assumes that human beings are primarily thinking things, or maybe believing animals. But I think both of these models give us a stunted, flattened picture of the rich complexity of being human.

There are (at least) two important implications that follow from this—such that the stakes of my argument spill beyond the walls of the school and university. On the one hand, this will obviously have implications for how we think about Christian education and, in particular, how we think about the mission and task of Christian schools, colleges, and universities. Based on the alternative model I will sketch in this book, how we think about distinctly Christian education would not be primarily a matter of sorting out which Christian ideas to drop into eager and willing mind-receptacles; rather, it would become a matter of thinking about how a Christian education shapes us, forms us, molds us to be a certain kind of people whose hearts and passions and desires are aimed at the kingdom of God. And that will require sustained attention to the practices that effect such transformation. In short, it's going to require that Christian education find its font and foundation in the practices of Christian worship. On the other hand, I think we'll also have to broaden our sense about the "spaces" of education. If education is primarily formation—and more specifically, the formation of our desires—then that means education is happening all over the place (for good and ill). Education as formation isn't the sort of thing that stays neatly within the walls of the school or college or university. If education is about formation, then we need to be attentive to all the formative work that is happening outside the university: in homes and at the mall; in football stadiums and at Fourth of July parades; in worship and at work.

Perhaps above all, this book is out to raise the stakes of Christian education, which will also mean raising the stakes of Christian worship. The goal is to get us to appreciate what's at stake in both—nothing less than the formation of radical disciples who desire the kingdom of God. But in order for this stake-raising to take place, we need to become attentive to our environment and our habits, to see them with new eyes, as if for the first time. To do that, let's consider a little case study.

Making the Familiar Strange: A Phenomenology of Cultural Liturgies

I would like to invite you for a tour of one of the most important religious sites in our metropolitan area. It is the kind of place that may be quite familiar to many of you, but my task here is actually to try to make this place strange. I will try to invite you to see it with new eyes, which will require trying to shake off the scales of mundane familiarity. This will require focused attention to detail; like a Tarkovsky film, imagine your attention focused by the slow, patient, observant gaze of the camera frame. We'll turn that camera gaze and let it hang on something you see all the time, but perhaps without seeing it. So you might imagine that we are Martian anthropologists who have come to this strange world of twenty-first-century North America in order to gather data on the rituals and religious habits of its inhabitants. Having made our way from Mars, equipped with the tools of ethnographic description, we are going to venture to one of this culture's most common religious sites and observe it with eyes that are focused on the religious aspects of its rituals. So join me in the approach to this site.

As we're still off at a distance, I want you to notice the sheer popularity of the site as indicated by the colorful sea of parking that surrounds the building. The site is throbbing with pilgrims every day of the week as thousands and thousands make the pilgrimage. In order to provide a hospitable environment and absorb the daily influx of the faithful, the site provides an ocean of parking. But the monotony of black tarmac is covered by dots of color from cars and SUVs lined up, row by row, patiently waiting as the pilgrims devote themselves to the rituals inside. Indeed, the parking lot constitutes a kind of moat around the building since there are no sidewalks that lead to the site. Religious sites of this kind almost inevitably emerge on the suburban edges of cities—areas planned around the automobile and generally suspicious of pedestrians. The sacred building even provides a sanctuary from this incessant culture of automobility, as some pilgrims make their way to this sanctuary—especially in winter—just for the space to walk.

We've now made our way into this glistening sea of black and color and found a haven for our vehicle, still quite a distance from the sanctuary. However, already the hospitality of this community extends itself: waiting for us is a train-like cart to convey our family across the parking lot. Other pilgrims board the conveyance, and we begin to wend our way toward the building that sprawls in both directions and seems to be rising from the horizon—a dazzling array of glass and concrete with recognizable ornamentation. Indeed, because this particular religious site is part of an international, yea “catholic,” network of religious communities, the architecture of the building has a recognizable code that makes us feel at home in any city. The large glass atriums at the entrances are framed by banners and Hags; familiar texts and symbols on the exterior walls help foreign faithful to quickly and easily identify what's inside; and the sprawling layout of the building is anchored by larger pavilions or sanctuaries akin to the vestibules of medieval cathedrals.

Our train ride has brought us to one of several grandiose entrees to the building, channeling us through a colonnade of chromed arches to the towering glass face, with doors lining its base. As we enter the space, we are ushered into a narthex of sorts intended for receiving, orienting, and channeling new seekers as well as providing a bit of a decompression space for the regular faithful to “enter in” to the spirit of the space. For the seeker, there is a large map—a kind of worship aid—to give the novice an orientation to the location of various spiritual offerings and provide direction into the labyrinth that organizes and channels the ritual observance of the pilgrims. (One can readily recognize the “regulars,” the faithful, who enter the space with a sense of achieved familiarity, who know the rhythms by heart because of habit-forming repetition.)

The design of the interior is inviting to an almost excessive degree, sucking us into the enclosed interior spaces, with windows on the ceiling open to the sky but none on the walls open to the surrounding automotive moat. This conveys a sense of vertical and transcendent openness that at the same time shuts off the clamor and distractions of the horizontal, mundane world. This architectural mode of enclosure and enfolding offers a feeling of sanctuary, retreat, and escape. From the narthex entry one is invited to lose oneself in this space, which channels the pilgrim into a labyrinth of octagons and circles, inviting a wandering that seems to escape from the driven, goal-oriented ways we inhabit the “outside” world. The pilgrim is also invited to escape from mundane ticking and counting of clock time and to inhabit a space governed by a different time, one almost timeless. With few windows and a curious baroque manipulation of light, it almost seems as if the sun stands still in here, or we lose consciousness of time's passing and so lose ourselves in the rituals for which we've come. However, while daily clock time is suspended, the worship space is very much governed by a kind of liturgical, festal calendar, variously draped in the colors, symbols, and images of an unending litany of holidays and festivals—to which new ones are regularly added, since the establishment of each new festival translates into greater numbers of pilgrims joining the processions to the sanctuary and engaging in worship.

The layout of this temple has architectural echoes that hark back to medieval cathedrals—mammoth religious spaces that can absorb all kinds of different religious activities all at one time. And so one might say that this religious building has a winding labyrinth for contemplation, alongside of which are innumerable chapels devoted to various saints. As we wander the labyrinth in contemplation, preparing to enter one of the chapels, we'll be struck by the rich iconography that lines the walls and interior spaces. Unlike the flattened depictions of saints one might find in stained-glass windows, here is an array of three-dimensional icons adorned in garb that—as with all iconography—inspires us to be imitators of these exemplars. These statues and icons embody for us concrete images of “the good life.” Here is a religious proclamation that does not traffic in abstracted ideals or rules or doctrines, but rather offers to the imagination pictures and statues and moving images. While other religions are promising salvation through the thin, dry media of books and messages, this new global religion is offering embodied pictures of the redeemed that invite us to imagine ourselves in their shoes—to imagine ourselves otherwise, and thus to willingly submit to the disciplines that produce the saints evoked in the icons.

Here again, we need to appreciate the catholicity of this iconography: these same icons of the good life are found in such temples across the country and around the world. The symbols and colors and images associated with their religious life are readily recognized the world over. The wide circulation of these icons through various mediums even outside the sanctuary invites us to make the pilgrimage in the first place. This temple—like countless others now emerging around the world—offers a rich, embodied visual mode of evangelism that attracts us. This is a gospel whose power is beauty, which speaks to our deepest desires and compels us to come not with dire moralisms but rather with a winsome invitation to share in this envisioned good life. (Yet one should note that it has its own modes of exclusivity too; because of its overwhelming success in converting the nations, it is increasingly difficult to be an infidel.) And it is a mode of evangelism buoyed by a transnational network of evangelists and outreach, all speaking a kind of unified message that puts other, fractured religions to shame. If unity is a testimony to a religion's truth and power, it will be hard to find a more powerful religion than this catholic faith.

As we pause to reflect on some of the icons on the outside of one of the chapels, we are thereby invited to consider what's happening within the chapel—invited to enter into the act of worship more properly, invited to taste and see. We are greeted by a welcoming acolyte who offers to shepherd us through the experience, but also has the wisdom to allow us to explore on our own terms. Sometimes we will enter cautiously, curiously, tentatively making our way through this labyrinth within the labyrinth, having a vague sense of need but unsure of how it will be fulfilled, and so are open to surprise—to that moment when the spirit leads us to an experience we couldn't have anticipated. Having a sense of our need, we come looking, not sure what for, but expectant, knowing that what we need must be here. And then we hit upon it: combing through the racks, we find that experience and offering that will provide fulfillment. At other times our worship is intentional, directed, and resolute: we have come prepared for just this moment, knowing exactly why we're here, in search of exactly what we need.

In either case, after time spent focused and searching in what the faithful call “the racks,” with our newfound holy object in hand, we proceed to the altar, which is the consummation of worship. While acolytes and other worship assistants have helped us navigate our experience, behind the altar is the priest who presides over the consummating transaction. And this is a religion of transaction, of exchange and communion. When invited to worship here, we are not only invited to give; we are also invited to take. We don’t leave this transformative experience with just good feelings or pious generalities, but rather with something concrete and tangible, with newly minted relics, as it were, that are themselves the means to the good life embodied in the icons who invited us into this participatory moment in the first place. And so we make our sacrifice, leave our donation, but in return receive something with solidity that is wrapped in the colors and symbols of the saints and the season. Released by the priest with a benediction, we make our way out of the chapel in a kind of denouement—not necessarily to leave (our awareness of time has been muted), but rather to continue contemplation and be invited into another chapel. Who could resist the tangible realities of the good life so abundantly and invitingly offered?

You’ve no doubt suspected that my phenomenology of this “religious” site is tongue in cheek, but I would resist the charge. Perhaps we need to confirm the identity of this religious site: as most of you have by now guessed, it is embodied in your local mall. Any generic, suburban mall will do, since the catholicity of this religion means that one will find an overwhelmingly uniform gospel preached at all of them. But I want to adamantly contend that describing the mall as a religious site is not merely a metaphor or an analogy. I’m not out to be merely playful or irreverent; rather, my goal is to try to make strange what is so familiar to us precisely in order to help us see what is at stake in formative practices that are part of the mall experience. The description is meant to be apocalyptic, in a sense, unveiling the real character of what presents itself as benign.⁴ The description is meant to shift our attention and perspective in order for us to recognize the charged, religious nature of cultural institutions that we all tend to inhabit as if they were neutral sites. Looking at the mall through the eyes of worship and liturgy, with attention to the concrete material practices that are part of the experience, gives us an angle on this cultural institution such that we can see that the mall has its own pedagogy, an interest in the education of desire. If it’s not quite The Education of Henry Adams, we might think of it as The Education of Hannah Montana.⁵ So we can at once appreciate that the mall is a religious institution because it is a liturgical institution, and that it is a pedagogical institution because it is a formative institution.

Seeing the mall as a liturgical and pedagogical institution helps us to see what’s at stake in its practices; at the same time, and for just this reason, I think this phenomenology of the mall’s liturgy points out the limits of a worldview approach. It’s hard to think of the mall in terms of worldview, as a place where ideas are proffered (quite the opposite!); but if we look at it from the perspective of love and practice, we become attentive to what’s at stake and begin to notice things we hadn’t seen before. Worldview approaches regularly (and rightly) make the claim that all human beings are inherently religious, that all human beings at root are believers who are committed to and oriented by a fundamental constellation of beliefs that, even if not reflected upon, govern and control our being and our doing—what James Olthuis calls our “visions of and for life.”⁶ Worldview-thinking also seeks to discern how such worldviews orient not just persons, but also communities, institutions, and systems.⁷ However, while worldview-talk (which I don’t want to entirely abandon) is critical of rationalist accounts of the human person that would reduce us to thinking machines, it still tends to exhibit a fairly “heady” or cognitive picture of the human person, and thus still thinks that the site of contestation between world-views or ground-motives is located in the realm of ideas.

But I think we run up against the limits of this approach when we try to make sense of the mall (to pick just one important cultural institution; we could also consider the university, the state, etc.). While with some hard work and some intellectual acrobatics one could make the case that what's at stake at the mall is ideas or beliefs, I don't think the faithful pilgrims to Hollister will find this very convincing. Indeed, the genius of mall religion is that actually it operates with a more holistic, affective, embodied anthropology (or theory of the human person) than the Christian church tends to assume! Because worldview-thinking still tends to focus on ideas and beliefs, the formative cultural impact of sites like the mall tends to not show up on our radar. Such a heady approach, focused on beliefs, is not really calibrated to see the quasi-liturgical practices at work in a site like the mall. An idea-centric or belief-centric approach will fail to see the pedagogy at work in the mall, and thus will also fail to articulate a critique and counter-pedagogy. In order to recognize the religious power and formative force of the mall, we need to adopt a paradigm of cultural critique and discernment that thinks even deeper than beliefs or world-views and takes seriously the central role of formative practices—or what I'll describe in this book as liturgies.

If many configurations of cultural practices function as quasi-liturgies, as formative pedagogies of desire that are trying to make us a certain kind of person, we need to ask ourselves: Is there a place that could form us otherwise—a space of counter-formation? Given the kinds of creatures we are—affective, desiring, liturgical animals—this can't be addressed merely with new ideas or even Christian perspectives. The pedagogy of the mall does not primarily take hold of the head, so to speak; it aims for the heart, for our guts, our kardia. It is a pedagogy of desire that gets hold of us through the body. So what would it take to resist the alluring formation of our desire—and hence our identity—that is offered by the market and the mall? If the mall and its “parachurch” extensions in television and advertising offer a daily liturgy for the formation of the heart, what might be the church's counter-measures? What if the church unwittingly adopts the same liturgical practices as the market and the mall? Will it then really be a site of counter-formation? What would the church's practices have to look like if they're going to form us as the kind of people who desire something entirely different—who desire the kingdom? What would be the shape of an alternative pedagogy of desire?

Because our hearts are oriented primarily by desire, by what we love, and because those desires are shaped and molded by the habit-forming practices in which we participate, it is the rituals and practices of the mall—the liturgies of mall and market—that shape our imaginations and how we orient ourselves to the world. Embedded in them is a common set of assumptions about the shape of human flourishing, which becomes an implicit telos, or goal, of our own desires and actions. That is, the visions of the good life embedded in these practices become surreptitiously embedded in us through our participation in the rituals and rhythms of these institutions. These quasi-liturgies effect an education of desire, a pedagogy of the heart. But if the church is complicit with this sort of formation, where could we look for an alternative education of desire?

The core claim of this book is that liturgies⁸—whether “sacred” or “secular”—shape and constitute our identities by forming our most fundamental desires and our most basic attunement to the world. In short, liturgies make us certain kinds of people, and what defines us is what we love. They do this because we are the sorts of animals whose orientation to the world is shaped from the body up more than from the head down. Liturgies aim our love to different ends precisely by training our hearts through our bodies. They prime us to approach the world in a certain way, to value certain things, to aim for certain goals, to pursue certain dreams, to work together on certain projects. In short, every liturgy constitutes a pedagogy that teaches us, in all sorts of precognitive ways, to be a certain kind of person. Hence every liturgy is an education, and embedded in every liturgy is an implicit worldview or “understanding” of the world.⁹ And by this I don’t mean that implanted in the liturgies are all kind of ideas to be culled from them; rather, implicit in them is an understanding of the world that is pretheoretical, that is on a different register than ideas. That is why the education of desire requires a project that aims below the head; it requires the pedagogical formation of our imagination, which, we might say, lies closer to our gut (kardia) than our head.

Now, in the same way that I’ve tried to raise the stakes of what’s going on in the mall, I also want to raise the stakes of what’s happening in Christian worship, whether in the storefront chapel or the metropolitan cathedral. What sorts of habits are going to be fostered by these rhythms and rituals? What sort of education of desire is taking place for those immersed in these sorts of worship contexts? Can we exegete the worldview implicit in these practices—these liturgies? An exegesis of several secular liturgies is the focus of chapter 3; a full exegesis of the practices of Christian worship is the task of chapters 4 and 5.

But what does this have to do with Christian education? What does liturgy have to do with learning? What does the church have to do with the Christian college? In this introduction, our concern is merely to get some issues and questions on the table, to open a space to consider a couple of key themes that will orient the book: first, I have tried to get us thinking about education, or pedagogy, in terms of practices or even rituals. In particular, I’ve been suggesting that education is not primarily a heady project concerned with providing information; rather, education is most fundamentally a matter of formation, a task of shaping and creating a certain kind of people. What makes them a distinctive kind of people is what they love or desire—what they envision as “the good life” or the ideal picture of human flourishing. An education, then, is a constellation of practices, rituals, and routines that inculcates a particular vision of the good life by inscribing or infusing that vision into the heart (the gut) by means of material, embodied practices. And this will be true even of the most instrumentalist, pragmatic programs of education (such as those that now tend to dominate public schools and universities bent on churning out “skilled workers”) that see their task primarily as providing information, because behind this is a vision of the good life that understands human flourishing primarily in terms of production and consumption. Behind the veneer of a “value-free” education concerned with providing skills, knowledge, and information is an educational vision that remains formative. There is no neutral, non-formative education; in short, there is no such thing as a “secular” education.

This is why I have also suggested a second, related theme: that the sorts of practices that form us—that form our core or ultimate identities—constitute liturgies. While this claim will be further unpacked in chapters 1 and 2, here let me just briefly explain: Because I think that we are primarily desiring animals rather than merely thinking things, I also think that what constitutes our ultimate identities—what makes us who we are, the kind of people we are—is what we love. More specifically, our identity is shaped by what we ultimately love or what we love as ultimate—what, at the end of the day, gives us a sense of meaning, purpose, understanding, and orientation to our being-in-the-world. What we desire or love ultimately is a (largely implicit) vision of what we hope for, what we think the good life looks like. This vision of the good life shapes all kinds of actions and decisions and habits that we undertake, often without our thinking about it. So when I say that love defines us, I don’t mean our love for the Chicago Cubs or chocolate chip scones, but rather our desire for a way of life. This element of ultimacy, I'll suggest, is fundamentally religious. But religion here refers primarily not to a set of beliefs or doctrines but rather to a way of life. What's at stake is not primarily ideas but love, which functions on a different register. Our ultimate love/desire is shaped by practices, not ideas that are merely communicated to us. This is why I describe the formative "civic pedagogies" of both the church and the mall as liturgies. This is a way of raising the stakes of what's happening in both. Thinking about such formative pedagogies as liturgies will help us appreciate that these constitute an education that is primarily formative rather than merely informative, and that such formation is about matters of ultimate concern.

So, "What does this have to do with education?" I hear someone ask. What does the Christian college have to do with these worship contexts? Are you saying we should quit college and stick to church? I want to note, up front, that this has two important implications (we'll discuss further implications in chapter 6). First, this model should push us to ask: Just what is a "Christian" education for? What is the aim, or telos, of a Christian education? Second, this should prompt us to rethink a common mantra in Christian schools and colleges, namely, that a Christian education is concerned with providing a Christian worldview. If we think about learning in terms of liturgy-pedagogy as liturgy-then I think we need a rearticulation of the end of Christian education, which will require a reconsideration of worldview-talk¹⁰ as it has come to dominate conceptions of Christian education.

The End of Christian Education: From Worldview to Worship (and Back Again)

Let me suggest an axiom: behind every pedagogy is a philosophical anthropology. In more pedestrian terms, behind every constellation of educational practices is a set of assumptions about the nature of human persons—about the kinds of creatures we are. Thus a pedagogy that thinks about education as primarily a matter of disseminating information tends to assume that human beings are primarily "thinking things" and cognitive machines. Ideas and concepts are at the heart of such pedagogies because they are aimed primarily at the head. Because of the intellectualist philosophical anthropology that is operative here, the body tends to drop out of the picture. There is little attention to the nitty-gritty details of material practices and the role that they play in education. In contrast, a pedagogy that understands education as formation usually assumes that human beings are a different kind of animal. It's not that we don't think, but rather that our thinking and cognition arise from a more fundamental, precognitive orientation to the world.¹¹ And that precognitive or prerational orientation to the world is shaped and primed by very material, embodied practices. Thus such a pedagogy is much more attuned to the formative role of ritual.

Picturing Education as Formation in Orwell's Road to Wigan Pier

We are so prone to associating education with the cognitive stuff of ideas that it's difficult for us to imagine education as a more formative, affective matter. Our imaginations get stuck in a rut, and it becomes difficult to get out of them to imagine things differently.¹² When that happens, theoretical dissertations aren't effective in destabilizing these habits of imagination: providing an argument for education as formation—the sort of thing that targets our cognitive head—often fails to touch our more ingrained imagination, whose center of gravity is closer to our bodies. To jolt the imagination, we need more affective pictures. So throughout this book I will occasionally try to picture my claims by drawing on the imaginative reservoirs of literature and film. The goal is to draw on more affective modes of expression in order not only to convince us of these things at a cognitive level but also to persuade us of them at a more affective level.¹³

For instance, I have been claiming that an education—whether acknowledged or not—is a formation of the desires and imagination that creates a certain kind of person who is part of a certain kind of people. The facts and information learned as part of the process are always situated and embedded in something deeper that is being learned all along: a particular vision of the good life. A rather ugly instance of this is pictured in George Orwell's Road to Wigan Pier, a work commissioned as a tract that would unveil the plight of the English working class in the coal-mining cities of the industrial North. To do so, Orwell spent time in the dilapidated slums that were so-called home to the underfed and underpaid miners and their families, whose work undergirded everything else that happened in the remnants of the British Empire. Orwell is particularly interested to remind his readers of this fact, readers from the South, members of the "intellectual Left" who would be reading Orwell's book in the comfort of heated homes with electric light and inside bathrooms—all things foreign to the miners' existence. How important to remember, then, that our civilisation, pace Chesterton, is founded on coal, more completely than one realizes until one stops to think about it. The machines that keep us alive, and the machines that make the machines, are all directly or indirectly dependent upon coal. In the metabolism of the Western world the coal-miner is second in importance only to the man who ploughs the soil. He is a sort of grimy caryatid upon whose shoulders nearly everything that is not grimy is supported.¹⁴

The first half of the book is Orwell at his finest as an investigate journalist, filling in the picture of the plight of the working class from firsthand immersion. It is a harrowing account of malnutrition, illness, and the debilitating psychological effects of persistent unemployment and poverty. But in the second half of the book, Orwell takes a surprising turn: he takes on the supposed middle-class champions of the working class, the intellectual Left, and challenges their sympathies. In particular, he questions whether they're really ready to jettison the class structure that they renounce in the parlors and lecture halls of London.

It is in this context that he provides a powerful portrayal of the effects of education. Orwell captures the odious nature of this caste system by seizing upon an axiom that eludes simple propositional articulation. As he puts it, "The real secret of class distinctions in the West" can be "summed up in four frightful words" that are often left unuttered: The lower classes smell.¹⁵ The statement itself is pungent to our ears (to mix senses). But Orwell's point is that the root of class distinctions in England is not intellectual; it's olfactory. The habits and rhythms of the system are not so much cerebral as visceral; they are rooted in a bodily orientation to the world that eludes theoretical articulation, which is why theoretical tirades also fail to displace it. Thus Orwell notes that we run up against "an impassable barrier": "For no feeling of like or dislike is quite so fundamental as a physical feeling." Almost every other kind of discrimination could be countered theoretically, with the weapons of facts, ideas, and information, "but physical repulsion cannot."¹⁶

But then, how does such a physical visceral stance get embedded in the middle and upper classes? It is a matter of formation ("in my childhood we were brought up to believe that they were dirty"), and more specifically, education. Thus Orwell recounts:

When I was fourteen or fifteen I was an odious little snob, but no worse than other boys of my own age and class. I suppose there is no place in the world where snobbery is quite so ever-present or where it is cultivated in such refined and subtle forms as in an English public school. ¹⁷ Here at least one cannot say that English “education” fails to do its job. You forget your Latin and Greek within a few months of leaving school—I studied Greek for eight or ten years, and now, at thirty-three, I cannot even repeat the Greek alphabet—but your snobbishness, unless you persistently root it out like the bindweed it is, sticks by you till your grave. ¹⁸

The information that the public schools provided—like Latin and Greek—didn’t really take root. What did get inscribed into the pupils, however, was an entire comportment to the world and society, a training in “snobbishness” that could not be easily overturned or undone by new facts or data or information. What would be required to “root out” such a visceral orientation is an equally visceral and physical education or counter-formation. Thus Orwell, somewhat in reverse, illustrates our core intuition that education is an embodied formation that captures our very being and shapes our orientation to the world. This may help us picture what it means to talk about education as formation. But it might also be an occasion to ask whether a Christian education could have the same odious effects as a public school education. Could we offer a Christian education that is loaded with all sorts of Christian ideas and information—and yet be offering a formation that runs counter to that vision?

If we consider these two very different understandings of education (the informative and the formative), and the different understandings of the human person that are at work behind them, I suggest that, over the past decades, institutions of Christian education have unwittingly absorbed the former and eschewed the latter. Many Christian schools, colleges, and universities—particularly in the Protestant tradition—have taken on board a picture of the human person that owes more to modernity and the Enlightenment than it does to the holistic, biblical vision of human persons. In particular, Christian education has absorbed a philosophical anthropology that sees human persons as primarily thinking things. The result has been an understanding of education largely in terms of information; more specifically, the end of Christian education has been seen to be the dissemination and communication of Christian ideas rather than the formation of a peculiar people. This can be seen most acutely, I think, in how visions of Christian education have been articulated in terms of “a Christian worldview.”

Over the past couple of decades, the growth of Christian colleges and universities has been attended by expanded discussions of their mission as “the integration of faith and learning.”¹⁹ It is then commonly claimed that students at Christian colleges and universities will learn a “Christian worldview”; or they will learn what everyone else learns but “from a Christian perspective” or a “Christian point of view.” However, “a Christian worldview” is identified primarily as a set of doctrines or a system of beliefs. Consider, for instance, Francis Beckwith’s definition of worldview in a recent collection:

What we mean is that the Christian faith is a philosophical tapestry of interdependent ideas, principles and metaphysical claims that are derived from the Hebrew-Christian Scriptures as well as the creeds, theologies, communities, ethical norms and institutions that have flourished under the authority of these writings. These beliefs are not mere utterances of private religious devotion but are propositions whose proponents claim accurately instruct us on the nature of the universe, human persons, our relationship with God, human communities and the morallife.²⁰

This is echoed in more popular usages of worldview that advocate “thinking ‘worldview-ishly’” and the importance of “worldview-thinking” by putting the Christian “belief-system” at the center of our cognition because “how a person thinks significantly influences his [sic] actions.”²¹ A worldview is construed as a set of implicit ideas.

Such construals of worldview belie an understanding of Christian faith that is dualistic and thus reductionistic: It reduces Christian faith primarily to a set of ideas, principles, claims, and propositions that are known and believed. The goal of all this is “correct” thinking. But this makes it sound as if we are essentially the sorts of things that Descartes described us to be: thinking things that are containers for ideas. What if that is actually only a small slice of who we are? And what if that’s not even the most important part? In the rationalist picture, we are not only reduced to primarily thinking things; we are also seen as things whose bodies are nonessential (and rather regrettable) containers for our minds. This is why such construals of a Christian worldview are also dualistic: they tend to assume a distinction between our souls and our bodies—and then tend to ignore our embodiment (or wish it weren’t there). But what if our bodies are essential to our identities? Weren’t we created as embodied creatures? What if the core of our identity is located more in the body than the mind?

In chapter 1, I want to suggest that worldview-talk has misconstrued the nature and task of Christian education because the operative notion of worldview at work there has been tied to a stunted, rationalist picture of the human person; in short, “worldview” has gotten hitched to the wagon of a misguided philosophical anthropology. Granted, I think this represents a distortion of a richer, more nuanced understanding of worldview in the Reformed tradition; but given how worldview-talk is generally understood, the concern of chapters 1 and 2 is a retooling of our understanding of the human person in order to push us beyond and under worldview to consider the central, formative role of worship. Being a disciple of Jesus is not primarily a matter of getting the right ideas and doctrines and beliefs into your head in order to guarantee proper behavior; rather, it’s a matter of being the kind of person who loves rightly—who loves God and neighbor and is oriented to the world by the primacy of that love. We are made to be such people by our immersion in the material practices of Christian worship—through affective impact, over time, of sights and smell in water and wine.

The liturgy is a “hearts and minds” strategy, a pedagogy that trains us as disciples precisely by putting our bodies through a regimen of repeated practices that get hold of our heart and “aim” our love toward the kingdom of God. Before we articulate a worldview, we worship. Before we put into words the lineaments of an ontology or an epistemology, we pray for God’s healing and illumination. Before we theorize the nature of God, we sing his praises. Before we express moral principles, we receive forgiveness. Before we codify the doctrine of Christ’s two natures, we receive the body of Christ in the Eucharist. Before we think, we pray. That’s the kind of animals we are, first and foremost: loving, desiring, affective, liturgical animals who, for the most part, don’t inhabit the world as thinkers or cognitive machines. In chapter 4, I’ll describe this as the primacy of worship to worldview or the priority of liturgy to doctrines. However, the point is fundamentally a reassertion and gloss on the classical axiom lex orandi, lex credendi: what the church prays is what the church believes. My contention is that given the sorts of animals we are, we pray before we believe, we worship before we know—or rather, we worship in order to know.

And this, I'm going to argue, should make a difference for how we think about the nature and task of Christian education—and thus what's at stake at a Christian college. The goal of chapter 6 is to rearticulate the end of Christian education by re-visioning both the telos and the practice of Christian education. With respect to its telos, or goal, in light of what we've suggested above about the nature of education as formative pedagogy, I will propose that the primary goal of Christian education is the formation of a peculiar people—a people who desire the kingdom of God and thus undertake their vocations as an expression of that desire. The task of a Christian school, college, or university is not to just provide a “safe” place for the dissemination of information that one can get at the public or state school down the street. Nor is it merely to provide a “Christian perspective” on what the world thinks counts as knowledge in order to become successful and productive citizens of a disordered society. Rather, the Christian college's mission is more radical than that: in some significant way, it involves the formation of disciples. In short, the Christian college is a formative institution that constitutes part of the teaching mission of the church.

With respect to practice, I will suggest that this vision of the mission of Christian education requires a correlate pedagogy that honors the formative role of material practices. Thus, I will argue that education at Christian colleges must be understood as liturgical in more than an analogical or metaphorical sense. Or perhaps to put it more starkly, I will suggest that we need to move from the model of “Christian universities,” identified as sites for transmitting Christian ideas, to “ecclesial colleges,” understood to be institutions intimately linked to the church and thus an extension of its practices. If Christian learning is nourished by a Christian worldview, and if that worldview is first and foremost embedded in the understanding that is implicit in the practices of Christian worship, then the Christian college classroom is parasitic upon the worship of the church—it lives off the capital of Christian worship.

Elements of a Theology of Culture: Pedagogy, Liturgy, and the Church

Before moving from this overview of the project to a more substantive unpacking of its components in the chapters that follow, let me also note that much of what I'll articulate here is not only of concern for students and professors, but also for pastors and parishioners. Indeed, many of the failures that I have noted with respect to stunted, dualistic visions of Christian education apply equally to how, over the past decades, we have come to “do church.” The core intuitions I'll unpack in this book are germane to the task of discipleship broadly conceived. In that sense, Desiring the Kingdom can be understood as a “theology of culture” (or, more generally, a Christian cultural theory) that

- Understands human persons as embodied actors rather than merely thinking things.
- Prioritizes practices rather than ideas as the site of challenge and resistance.
- Looks at cultural practices and institutions through the lens of worship or liturgy.

- Retains a robust sense of antithesis without being simply “anti-cultural.”

My concern is to develop a cultural theory that has a radar, so to speak, attuned not primarily to ideas but to practices, and more specifically, to identity-forming practices that I’ll describe as liturgies. The goal is a theology of culture that gives space to a certain ambivalence—a theological account of culture that is nimble, can recognize and account for complexity, but also has an ecclesial center of gravity, we might say. By looking at cultural institutions through the lens of worship and liturgy, I hope to raise the stakes of what it means for us to be immersed in such cultural rituals. And as a result, I also hope to give us a new appreciation for what is at stake in the practices of Christian worship as an alternative cultural formation.

NOTES

1. This defense is necessary because many North American Christians have an understanding of faith that prizes concern with eternity and personal salvation over “worldly” activities like engaging in research and gaining knowledge of this world. According to this dualistic picture, Christians should be spending their time and energy in missions and evangelism, not cancer research and art history. Thus many articulations of the ideals of Christian higher education begin back on their heels and have to first justify why Christians should be concerned with “the life of the mind.” See, for example, Clifford Williams, The Life of the Mind: A Christian Perspective (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2002).

2. I ask the reader who might be worried that my proposal amounts to a newfangled form of anti-intellectualism to especially note the adverbial qualifiers in this paragraph (primarily, fundamentally, first and foremost, etc.). I am not advocating a new form of pious dichotomy that would force us to choose between either the heart or the mind. Rather, I will sketch an account of the priority of affectivity that undergirds and makes possible the work of the intellect. In short, I’m not arguing that we love, and therefore we need not know; rather, we love in order to know. In this respect I hope I’m echoing an ancient theme we find in Augustine and Maximus the Confessor. For related discussion, see Aristotle Papanikolaou, “Liberating Eros: Confession and Desire,” Journal of the Society of Christian Ethics 26 (2006): 115-36.

3. My primary focus in this book will be Christian higher education. However, I think almost everything I have to say here also has implications for Christian education at the K-12 level.

4. This notion of an “apocalyptic” reading of culture will be pursued in more detail in chapter 3.

5. See Mark Schwehn’s reflections on The Education of Henry Adams in Exiles from Eden: Religion and the Academic Vocation in America (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993), 94-126. There is an interesting literary history found in works concerned with “The Education of . . .,” such as Erasmus’s Education of a Prince (1516); Schiller’s Letters upon the Aesthetic Education of Man (1794); Marie, the Grand Duchess of Russia, in her memoir The Education of a Princess (1890); and most famously, The Education of Henry Adams. This literary tradition tends to exhibit a more holistic understanding of education as the formation of an identity and the forging of character—education as the creation of a kind of person.

6. James Olthuis, “On Worldviews,” Christian Scholar’s Review 14.2 (1985): 153-64.

7. E.g., Herman Dooyeweerd, Roots of Western Culture, trans. John Kraay (Toronto: Wedge, 1979).

8. Throughout this book, I simply use the term liturgy as a synonym for worship. In the word liturgy, readers should not hear the valorization of any particular form or style; at the same time, I hope those readers who associate negative connotations with the word liturgy will suspend judgment and simply hear the word as a shorthand for naming worship practices of all kinds. I discuss this further at the end of chapter 4.

9. In the next section, and chapters 1 and 2, we'll nuance this claim a bit, drawing on Heidegger's notion of "understanding" (Verstehen) as developed in Charles Taylor's notion of "social imaginaries."

10. When I use this phrase throughout the book, I'm playing off Mary Ann Glendon, Rights Talk: The Impoverishment of Political Discourse (New York: Free Press, 1993).

11. I continue to find it difficult to come up with a lexicon that can address these distinctions in a neat and tidy way, particularly since the same terms can mean very different things in different disciplines. Wrestling with this challenge will be a core project of volume 2. To this point, I tend to use the word cognitive as a shorthand for describing a reflective, propositional way of intending the world that traffics in thinking and ideas. I will then tend to distinguish this from what I'll call the affective, by which I mean a prereflective, imaginative "attunement" to the world that precedes the articulation of ideas and even beliefs. (Indeed, I have in mind something like Heidegger's account of Befindlichkeit, "attunement" or "affectedness.") If it's not too cute, I would suggest this distinction (which is not an opposition) is akin to the distinction between reading the newspaper or a textbook and reading a poem or a novel. Both have content, but they activate very different compartments to the world, drawing on different parts of us, as it were.

12. This is an example of the way that particular configurations of the "social imaginary" can become so dominant that we fail to see them as a particular, contingent construal. Instead, these ingrained habits of perception are taken to just be "the way things are." Thus Charles Taylor contends that the "modern" social imaginary "has now become so self-evident to us that we have trouble seeing it as one possible conception among others" (Modern Social Imaginaries [Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2004], 2). In a similar way, Christian Smith suggests that the ubiquity of "liberal democratic capitalism" in the modern West is what also secures its transparency: "Its suppositional beliefs, its deeply trusted assumptions, its elemental cultural ontology have become nearly invisible to us precisely because it has become ubiquitous and dominant" (Moral, Believing Animals [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003], 60). In short, the ubiquity and dominance of this social imaginary make it almost impossible to imagine anything other. Both education and worship should be practices that precisely loosen up and stretch our imaginations such that we can begin to imagine things otherwise. We will discuss this further in chapters 1 and 2.

13. I have in mind here something like the account of "persuasion" at work in Milbank's Theology and Social Theory and David Bentley Hart's Beauty of the Infinite. Persuasion is a more aesthetic mode than demonstration. For a discussion, see James K. A. Smith, "Questions about the Perception of 'Christian Truth': On the Affective Effects of Sin," New Blackfriars 88 (September 2007): 585-93.

14. George Orwell, The Road to Wigan Pier (London: Penguin, 2001), 18.

15. Ibid., 119.

16. Ibid.

17. North American readers should note that “public” schools in Britain are elite “private” schools in American parlance.
18. Orwell, Road to Wigan Pier, 128.
19. I will not focus on “integration” talk here. For my criticisms, see James K. A. Smith, Introducing Radical Orthodoxy: Mapping a Post-secular Theology (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2004), 143-79.
20. Francis Beckwith, introduction to To Everyone an Answer: A Case for the Christian Worldview, ed. Francis Beckwith, William Lane Craig, and J. P. Moreland (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity, 2004), 14.
21. Kenneth Richard Samples, A World of Difference: Putting Christian Truth-Claims to the Worldview Test (Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 2007), 15. For other popular accounts along these rationalist lines, see “The Truth Project” from Focus on the Family (www.thetruthproject.org).

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That until the heinous practice of Abortion on demand is abolished in this Country that the 3rd Sunday in January, or the Sunday closest to Holy Innocents, be designated Sanctity of Life Sunday and observed in all our Parishes. Furthermore, that our Clergy be instructed to prepare and deliver a sermon on that theme at the Worship services on that day. Liturgical resources are available from the Diocesan Headquarters for use on this Sunday.
2. That this Council commend the support of Cranmer Theological house to the parishes of our Diocese and that every effort be made to support this essential ministry both in terms of finances and personnel.

Respectfully submitted,

The Rt. Rev. Daniel R. Morse
Missionary Bishop

BISHOPS

MORSE, The Rt. Rev. Daniel R (Dan)
NOLDEN, The Rt. Rev. Wesley L. Nolden, II

PRESBYTERS

ADAMS, The Rev. Dr. Lawrence
BOETTNER, The Rev. Roy K. (Keith)
BROWN, The Rev. Mark
CAMLIN, The Rev. Charles F.
CLAUSON, The Rev. Dr. Marc A.
EDGERTON, The Rev. Paul
HARKNESS, The Rev. Mike
HEATON, The Rev. John
HOPKINS, The Rev. Edward Y.
HOUSER, The Rev. Canon Jon S. (Scott) Canon
JENKINS, The Rev. Kit R.
KUMP, The Rev. William T.
LONGMIRE, Jr., The Rev. Canon Rodney H., Canon Missioner
MANTO, The Venerable Peter, Archdeacon
MACGREGOR, Rev. Ian H.
MASHBURN, The Rev. Fr. Gregory
MCNAMARA, The Rev. Wayne M.
RUBY Jr., The Rev. Dr. Walter M.
SANDERS, The Rev. Franklin
STEERE III, The Rev. Samuel A. (Sam)
STRAW, The Rev. David
THOMAS, The Rev. Daniel
USELTON, The Rev. Randy

DEACONS

ABSHEAR, The Rev. David
HERMAN, The Rev. Christopher (Chris)
HOUCK, The Rev. John
JOHNSON, The Rev. Dr. John
LITTLEJOHN, The Rev. Robert, Ph.D.,
MARTIN, The Rev. Bartholomew P. (Bart)
SPIETH, The Rev. Michael Spieth
THOMPSON, The Rev. W. Scott
TRUAX, The Rev. David

DEACONESSES

JACQUES, Ella Carol (Candy)

CALDWELL, Michelle

RETIRED CLERGY

JOSEPHSEN, Jr. The Rev. Dr. Hans E.

NEEB, The Rev. Robert

POSTLUANTS

HANNA, Mark

KELL, Jonathan

PARISHES

ALABAMA

St. Philip the Apostle

St. John's Of Mt. Laurel

FLORIDA

Anglican Church of the Resurrection

NORTH CAROLINA

Church Of The Redeemer

All Saints Anglican

INDIANA

Trinity

OHIO

Christ Our Hope

Christ The King

Trinity

TENNESSEE

St. James

St. Andrew's

Christ Covenant

St. Michael And All Angels

Christ Our Hope

VIRGINIA

St. Andrew's

Covenant

Holy Trinity
St. Timothy
St. Peter's

Point of Order was made by Pat Smith (from Rodney Longmire's parish):
Have the delegates been seated? Reply, yes.

Motion made to adjourn meeting downstairs because "some" people were allergic to the incense used during the worship service.

The motion was seconded by an unknown male member of Fr. Longmire's parish.

Discussion: Chip said Air conditioning was not working downstairs and this is why we are meeting up here. Fr. Wayne McNamarra said meeting there would interfere with lunch preparation and the air conditioning is wimpy, and noisy.

A vote was called: Not carried.

The Treasurers Report given by Rev. Franklin Sanders, Treasurer (Which see).

The Budget is a guess. We got money from dissolved parish. It was invested and worth is $44,000.00 today. The budget shows a deficit but we can operate for years with this.

We are $5000 better off than we projected.

Preliminary Budget Report: This is why giving tithe reports is important. Projections cannot be made without these reports.

See Preliminary Budget Report.

This is the last year the Archdiocese will send us a subsidy. We are saving on medical insurance because Bp. Morse' wife went on Medicare. Also, we may be able to place Bp. Morse On the ACNA insurance plan and reduce the amount paid.

There are co-pays for his wife's illness. If there are none, these will not be paid.

Question from Pat Smith: There is an $18,000.00 increase in expenses, can you clarify this?

Rev. Sanders replied that the main increase is coming out of Bishop's housing allowance. Chip asked if she is comparing 2009 with 2011? It is not $18,000.00. You have to add the two columns. Total budget is $123,350,00, so actual is $12,000.00. The tithe to REC increased because we collected more money last year and travel expenses have increased based on our experience.

Motion made to accept the report and was seconded, the report to be accepted and budget adopted. Motion carried.

Clergy Relief Fund: It is set up to help clergy who find themselves, through no fault of their own, in dire circumstances. We have had three instances in three years. It is important to give to this fund.

Additional Item: Our Bishop does not have an appropriate Crosier. It is a prop, not a real one. A real one may cost between $500.00 and $1700.00, though this is not certain. Please go back to your parishes and ask regarding this.

Fr. Rodney Longmire pointed out it needs to be able to be taken apart for travel.

The Venerable Peter Manto thanked Fr. Sanders and Mark.

Standing Committee Report was given by the Rev. Fr. Charlie Camlin (which see).

Amy Willmann, Director of Development at Dominion Academy of Dayton spoke of some of the offerings the school has educationally. Her main focus was on the All Nations Scholarship Fund and an appeal for funds to help a refugee.

Bp. Nolden made a book recommendation: The Gospel and the Catholic Church by Archbishop Ramsey.

Bp. Nolden adjourned the meeting with prayer.

The Second Business Meeting:

The date and place of next Synod was discussed. Canon Houser recommended St. James, Memphis. Motion and seconded. Motion passed.

Rev. Walter Ruby mentioned there is a church building and a parish available in Victoria, TN for anyone interested.

Bp. Wes Nolden asked Fr. Thomas to give an exhortation on missions and lead a talk about what clergy are doing successfully to grow their missions.

The Rev. Dr. Daniel Thomas gave an exhortation for the missionaries in our Diocese:

In the Star Wars movie series, evil and darkness has replaced good and light. Oppression and fear reign in the Galaxy. One day a small band of rebels dares to stand up against the evil empire. Its leader allows himself to be killed, vowing that if he does die, he will become more powerful than the evil ones can imagine. In his death, he is able to empower his people to overcome the evil and gain victory, destroying the evil emperor and his empire.

We are missionaries, you and I. Darkness is growing ever stronger in our land. Even in 1984 Wolfart Pannenberg warned that the words God and gods, upon which understanding all cultures were founded, are no longer understood in their traditional terms. We have people who have many different understandings of the word God and who he is and we have to look no farther than our own increasingly pagan church folk to see that. There is a famine in the land of the knowledge of God's word and knowledge of God. Darkness has replaced God in the lives of most Americans today. God has called us as missionaries. Christ sacrificed himself and rose again and is now empowering us to build his Church. Jesus said in Matthew 16:18 "I will build my Church and the gates of hell will not prove stronger than it." He empowers us to overcome the darkness in men's souls and win back humanity from the clutches of evil.

So convinced of the empowerment of Christ upon his missionary activities was C.T. Studd, that he said, "Some wish to live within the sound of a chapel bell; I wish to run a rescue mission within a yard of hell." My friends, God has called us, out of all the rest of his followers, to have this unique gifting and calling as missionaries. God will give us victory if we remain faithful to his call. Nate Saint, a missionary martyr said, "People who do not know the Lord ask why in the world we waste our lives as missionaries. They forget that they too are expending their lives ... and when the bubble has burst, they will have nothing of eternal significance to show for the years they have wasted." I have a friend that started the Orthodox Church in Indonesia. He has been very successful in winning the Muslims to the Lord. However, his own Orthodox Church leaders have persecuted him and have removed his funding. Patriarchs, Metropolitan, and Archbishops have tried to have him murdered out of greed and jealousy. He is frequently in hiding because of it, yet God uses him mightily to win people to Christ. He will not give up for he knows the gates of hell will not prove stronger than Christ.

When men used to go to war in the old wooden war ships, the mark of surrender was to lower the flag, called the "Colours." If they were determined never to surrender, they would nail the colours to the mast so they could not signal they had given up. C.T. Studd, in speaking of missionary endeavors said, "Nail the colours to the mast! That is the right thing to do, and, therefore, that is what we must do, and do it now. What colours? The colours of Christ, the work He has given us to do — the evangelization of all the unevangelized. Christ wants not nibblers of the possible, but grabbers of the impossible, by faith in the omnipotence, fidelity, and wisdom of the Almighty Saviour Who gave the command. Is there a wall in our path? By our God we will leap over it! Are there lions and scorpions in our way? We will trample them under our feet! Does a mountain bar our progress? Saying, 'Be thou cast into the sea,' we will march on. Soldiers of Jesus! Never surrender! Nail the colours to the mast!"

My friends, never give up. No matter what they say about you, no matter that it looks like you are being defeated and not having an effect, never give up. What you do matters and even if one life is changed, the world is changed forever. Christ will build his Church and the gates of hell will not prove stronger than it.

The Rev. Dr. Daniel Thomas followed this by asking for those who had ideas that are working in their mission efforts to give a brief synopsis. He told of his simple Bible Studies he made that had been effectual.

Rev. Sanders told of his outreach efforts at the prison and how effective it had been.

Rev. Straw said that he has constant activities such as “Fishing for Jesus” and “Shoot the Pastor” which the youth in the parish oppose the clergy in Laser Tag) and “blessing of the animals” (at which they bless the police dogs too).

Dn. Chris Herman gave the Report on Christ Our Hope Mission:

Sr. Sarah Masterson gave the Deaconess Report:

Deaconess is an ancient ministry effectually bringing the compassion of God to the modern world.

Women, Children in Need: In our own society, women are in poverty, without family, raising kids alone. Divorce, abuse, trauma, economic problems, etc. are common.

Deaconess is Biblical and patristic. In Romans 16:1-2 Phoebe is called diakonon, Timothy 3:8-12 these women must be grave, not slanderers, sober, full of faith.

Diakonon means service freely and lovingly given. Jesus said I came not to be served but to serve and I am among you as one that serves.

There are numerous patristic references in the Eastern Church: Sts Basil and Gregory Nyssa, et al. St. Chrysostom had 40 deaconesses in his church. The order reached its highest numbers in 4th, 5th, 6th Centuries.

Deaconesses did not participate in the sacrament of holy orders. They were set apart by prayer and laying on of hands by a Bishop. They had no liturgical role. They were considered clergy in both ecclesial and secular law. They were servants of the chief pastor. They focused on service. They assisted in baptism, with anointing, and with Chrism. They instructed catechumens. They had oversight of widows and orphans, teaching and discipleship of women, and carried messages from a bishop to women. They did ministry to the sick and poor in homes and hospitals. They ministered to martyrs in prison.

The order was never abolished. After the 6th Century it declined as the breakup of Roman Empire made it unsafe for women to live and work alone. Monasteries absorbed the deaconess' functions.

1734 non-juring Scottish bishops desired to revive it. In 1822 Lutherans in Germany brought it back. 1862 Bp. Tait of London set apart the first Anglican deaconess.

The REC has its own canon on deaconesses.

Rev. Canon Houser spoke on Lancelot Andrewes' Theology of the Incarnation.

The meeting was adjourned by Bp. Nolden.